Pulitzer Prize-winning author Richard Russo will be at Wilton Library on Sunday.

Pulitzer-winner Russo 'always working'

Pulitzer-winning author Richard Russo is not one of those writers who dreamed of telling stories from a young age.

Russo, who will be at the Wilton Library this Sunday, did not aspire to write novels, but he did dream of studying them. The young Russo earned his Ph.D. in American Literature at the University of Arizona before he discovered that wasn't the career he wanted.

"By the time I'd finished, I realized that I didn't really want to do it," he said.

Russo might have been able to set his jaw and carry on as an American lit professor, but for his university's creative writing department, which was across the hall. Everyone in that department seemed to be having a pretty good time, he said.

"You can stand misery as long as there aren't happy people nearby," joked Russo.

So Russo went across the hall, and American literature — his field of study — was forever changed. In 1986, he published "Mohawk," the first of seven novels. His 1993 novel "Nobody's Fool" was adapted for a 1994 film, he's penned screenplays, a collection of short stories, and, in 2002, won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction.

"I probably should have come to it sooner," he said. "I come from a long line of...storytellers. But none of them did it professionally."

"That Old Cape Magic" is Russo's latest book, released last year by Random House. The novel is the focus of Wilton's townwide Wilton Reads! program this year.

The novel follows Jack Griffin, a disillusioned screenwriter-turned-college professor, as he and his wife attend two weddings, one on Cape Cod, a place filled with memories for Griffin. In the course of a year, Griffin deals with disappointments, family and the problems in his own marriage.

The character of Griffin sounds as if he could be a stand-in for Russo, a 61-year-old former professor and sometime screenwriter who is a father to two daughters.

"Yes, a lot of my characters are autobiographical, and not just the protagonists," said Russo.

Russo admits to autobiographical characters in his work, but cautions readers to look beyond his characters' vital statistics when drawing comparisons.

He cites one of his short stories, in which an elderly Belgian nun named Sister Ursula enters a writing class taught by a middle-aged professor. Russo has often been asked if he is that professor.

His response is always this: "Why don't you ask me if I'm that nun?"

Sister Ursula's background contains much more autobiographical information, he said, but because the professor is a middle-aged male, people often think the professor is Russo.

Russo's identification with the fictional Sister Ursula runs counter to allegations that Russo is a misogynist. Last August, Newsweek published a piece about "That Old Cape Magic." The writer of the piece accused Russo of

The sixth annual Wilton Reads! program will close with a bang next Sunday, when Pulitzer winner Richard Russo appears to discuss his latest novel, "That Old Cape Magic."

Russo's book is at the center of the Wilton Library's sixth annual Wilton Reads! program, which kicked off at the beginning of this month. Free books were distributed to the community on Tuesday, June 1, copies of the book in every format have been circulating at the library, and book discussions were conducted this month by Joanne Ecke, Ph.D. and Susan Boyar.

Ecke reported about 35 participants at her reading group, which is held in the morning.

"They liked it more as the discussion went on," she said of their reaction to the novel.

Ecke compares Richard Russo to both James Joyce and John Steinbeck.

"He takes his time," she said.

In Ecke's group, readers responded to Russo's warmth, to his depiction of the region and to his sense of humor.

Russo is a cross-over author, said Ecke.

"He straddles the line between being a popular artist and being a serious artist," she said.

Russo, interviewed ahead of his appearance in Wilton, says that was a shortcoming in the early days, when he was trying to get published. Publishers didn't know whether to market him as a popular author or a literary author.

"They had no idea how to sell my book," he said. Luckily for him, instead of being shunned by both the popular and literary markets, he was embraced by both and his work appeals to a very wide audience.

Boyar, who conducted the evening group, thinks that many people are drawn to Russo's endings.

Russo always has a story to tell writing two kinds of women: angels and demons.

"I just say, 'Read the books,'" said Russo. "I just tell people to read the books and look at the women in them. Read them and see what you think."

He laughed and added that anyone who accuses him of misogyny would do well to avoid his family.

"My daughters would have something to say about that," he said.

Russo considers himself to be a comic writer; he loves the work of Charles Dickens and Mark Twain and has taken lessons about humor from the work of each.

"Despite the fact that I'm a comic writer, I like to go to really dark places in my work," he said. "I learned that from Twain."

Interestingly, Russo will be appearing with Twain in Granta Magazine this year. According to Russo, the British quarterly will print Russo's first non-fiction piece in its next issue, along with a previously unpublished excerpt from Twain's autobiography.

Russo's piece, he said, will probably contribute to a non-fiction book, at some point.

"There's something like a memoir down the road," he said. Before that happens, however, Russo is going to do something he's never done before: write a sequel.

"I'm going to revisit some characters from 'Nobody's Fool,'" he said.

Of course, there are other projects as well; film projects and a very long story are in the works, but that seems to be the way things work for Russo.

"Oh," he said. "I'm always working."
